This is the third book I've read on stoicism, and overall I don't like it as much as the others. I expected a straightforward practical emphasis because the author is a psychotherapist, the title refers to 'the art of happiness', there's a blurb on the cover saying 'ancient tips for modern challenges', and the book is part of a 'Teach Yourself' series.

Just finished reading 'Teach Yourself Stoicism and the Art of Happiness' (2013) by Donald J. Robertson. I decided to borrow a copy to learn and understand more about Stoicism, the ancient philosophy that is the main opponent of Epicureanism, thus serving as a good contrast book after 'Travels with Epicurus' which I read earlier this year.

What the Zen art of archery and the Stoic art of living share is a seemingly paradoxical indifference to whether one is successful or not. What matters is mastering the art and practising it. In the case of Stoicism this means acting virtuously, with the right intentions, at all times and for its own sake.
