So Stanley Fish wrote a book called Surprised by Sin: The Reader in Paradise Lost. He set out to explore how readers respond to John Milton's epic about the creation of humans—and their fall from grace. One of the big characters in the poem is Satan. Yup, we're talking about that dude with horns, tails, and a pitchfork—the embodiment of evil.

Reader-Response Theory Analysis - Paradise Lost by John Milton

by Malcolm West. Fish discerns a pattern in the poem in which a reader is continually surprised by sin and in shame and rises against it (44). Just as the Old Testament Law displays the natural depravity of man, Paradise Lost jars complacent Christians (not apostates or atheist) from their slumber with unflattering,...

1> For the past twenty-five years, the idea that Stanley Fish's seminal Surprised by Sin: The Reader in "Paradise Lost" is "a methodologically radical update" of C. S. Lewis's A Preface to "Paradise Lost" "as a literary monument to mainstream Christianity" (Rumrich, Milton 4) has developed into a truism of sorts within certain circles of Milton scholarship.

David V. Urban: "Surprised by Richardson" - blogspot.com

In Surprised By Sin: The Reader in Paradise Lost, Stanley Fish's most famous work of scholarship, Fish argues that Satan is evil because he is "the poem's true materialist"—and while Fish might say that he is merely reporting John Milton's view, not revealing his own, still it's difficult not to take away the conclusion that there ...

Abstract. I would like to suggest something about Paradise Lost that is not new except for the literalness with which the point will be made: (1) the poem's centre of reference is its reader who is also its subject; (2) Milton's purpose is to educate the reader to an awareness of his position and responsibilities as a fallen man, and to a sense of the distance which separates him from the ...
