A modest helping of philosophical broth, clean but thin, instead of the hearty stew it might have been. The sextet—truth, goodness, beauty ("ideas we judge by"), justice, equality, and liberty ("ideas we act on")—could obviously get no more than summary treatment in a single volume. Even so, readers who happen not to share Adler's commitment to realism in general and Aristotle in ...

Six great ideas -- truth, goodness, beauty, liberty, equality, justice. Why these six? MORTIMER J. ADLER: One answer, Bill, is the Declaration of Independence -- the document that every American should understand -- and five of those six ideas are in the first four lines of the second paragraph. Let me recite those four lines:

If we take the adjective "great" as the qualifier of ideas and as the controlling criterion of our other uses of it, then many things are clarified and little controversy is engendered. The great conversation is the discussion of the great ideas during the last twenty-five centuries of Western culture.
