Here's a thought, and maybe it won't work. But I am still curious if anyone has ever tried it. Wouldn't attaching one's manual grinder to a reliable grounding system (either the grounding conductor on one's electrical system or the water piping) eliminate all trouble with statics in freshly ground coffee? To be more specific, all commercial grinders with metal housing come with a three-prong...

Experiencing static shock may have been fun in science class, but it's not fun when you experience it at home. Getting a static shock is painful and annoying. It's an effect of dry air, which is often the result of heating your home or living in an arid climate. Not only is a static shock uncomfortable, it can also be costly.
